GUAM DAILY POST • SUNDAY, JULY 1, 2018

Cease fire in southwestern Syria nears collapse

US, Russia trade blame

BEIRUT (The Washington Post) — A year-old cease fire in southwestern Syria, long cited by the Trump administration as a test of whether the United States and Russia can work together in a conflict that finds them on opposite sides, is on the verge of collapse amid an accelerating offensive by the Syrian government and its allies.

The U.S. and Russian governments this week accused each other of failing to adhere to the agreement that was finalized at July 2017 in a meeting between President Donald Trump and Russian President Vladimir Putin. Both governments said that Syria will be a main agenda item when the two leaders next meet in Helsinki next month.

In the meantime, the United Nations warned that what it described as the potential next bloodbath in Syria, this time along the borders of Jordan and Israel, risked a wider conflict.

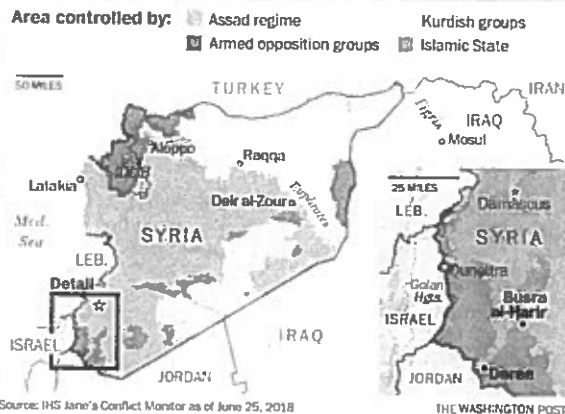

On Sunday, Russian warplanes joined the offensive by forces loyal to Syrian President Bashar Assad to reclaim territory in the border province of Daraa, which had been captured by rebels over the past seven years. The attacks have targeted medical facilities and rescue workers, and prompted tens of thousands of residents to flee their homes for safer territory.

An airstrike Thursday killed at least 17 civilians who had been hiding in an underground shelter, according to witnesses and war monitors.

As thousands fled the intensifying bombardments, advancing Syrian government forces seized control of the town of Harak, according to a statement by the Lebanese Hezbollah militia, which is among the Iranian-backed groups taking part in the offensive.

Pompeo says Russia violated agreement

Secretary of State Mike Pompeo

— Secretary of State Mike Pompeo

said at a Senate hearing on Wednesday that Russia has violated the Trump-Putin agreement and that “we have both spoken to them about it and issued public statements indicating exactly that.”

Asked by Delaware Sen. Christopher Coons, whether the Russians were “listening, and do they care?” Pompeo said, “They’re certainly listening,” but that he “can’t speak to” whether they care.

“It’s not just our voice, it’s the voice of the Israelis and the Jordanians as well,” he said, calling Russian behavior “unacceptable.” He said that the 2,200 U.S. troops in Syria “don’t have the ability to reach the region” where the offensive is taking place. Those troops are deployed against the Islamic State in the eastern part of the country.

Jordanian King Abdullah II visited

Washington this week, in part for Syria consultations.

Israeli army chief of staff Gadi Eisenkot also arrived in Washington on Thursday, and that country’s national security cabinet is due to convene a meeting Sunday to discuss the border situation. Israeli aircraft have launched repeated strikes against Iranian targets inside Syria, and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu’s government has said it will not tolerate any Iranian or allied forces in the border area.

In a message to U.S.-allied Syrian rebels in the area, the U.S. Embassy in Amman said that they would be on their own if they decided to resist the government advances.

“You should not base your decision on the assumption or expectation of military intervention by the U.S.,” said the message, delivered in Arabic over a messaging app and shared by a member of the Syrian opposition.

Following a statement by the Russian Defense Ministry that it remained committed to the cease-fire deal, the Russian Foreign Ministry said Thursday that it was aiding the fight against “terrorists” in the region.

“It’s nighttime our American partners did what the Syrian forces are doing now with the support of Russia’s aerospace forces,” ministry spokeswoman Maria Zakharova told reporters.

U.S. officials have often referred to the southwest cease fire as evidence that efforts to cooperate with Russia on counterterrorism and a political solution to Syria’s separate civil war can succeed.

The fact that the agreement — in which fighters opposed to Assad and government forces froze in place along a line policed by Russia — largely held for nearly a year “is a significant achievement in itself,” Brett McGurk, the special U.S. envoy to the counter-Islamic State coalition said at a conference in Israel last month.

As part of the deal, formalized by Trump and Putin at the Group of 20 summit in Germany last July, all “foreign fighters” were to leave the area, including Hezbollah and other Iranian-backed militias.

“One year ago, this southwest corner was on the verge of a major conflict, and Daraa City was at risk,” McGurk said. “Since then, the fighting between the opposition and the Syrian regime has largely stopped, hundreds of families have returned to their homes, and thousands of lives have likely been saved.”

Just weeks later, however, Assad declared his intention to retake one of the last remaining parts of the country outside government control and began moving forces southward from around Damascus.

The fighting seems set to intensify despite appeals by the international community to allow time for diplomacy to avert a battle that risks triggering a renewed humanitarian catastrophe and could draw in regional countries.

The U.N. special envoy for Syria, Staffan de Mistura, told the Security Council on Wednesday that he is “gravely concerned” by the battlefield developments. He urged world powers to find a solution that will spare civilian suffering and avert regional tensions so that “we do not see once again ... a repetition of what we saw sadly in Aleppo and Eastern Ghouta.” He was referring to the devastating carnage in the city in northern Syria two years ago and in the Damascus suburb earlier this year.

“And yet I see things moving in this direction,” he said. Already, the fight for Daraa is turning into a grim replay of those key battles.

The Britain-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said at least five children were among 17 people known to have been killed in Thursday’s strike on the shelter in the rural town of Musayfra. The toll could rise, the group said, because many people are critically injured.

A doctor who joined the rescue teams that headed to the scene put the toll at 23, including 11 children, and said approximately 15 other people were taken to hospitals. He said about 40 people from four families had been hiding from relentless airstrikes in the basement of a building on the outskirts of the town when the building took a direct hit.

“There were pieces of flesh and rubble everywhere,” said the doctor, who did not want to be identified out of fear for his safety.

The families had already escaped their homes in the center of the town in the hope of avoiding the bombardments, he said.

Photographs posted on social media by activists showed the bloodied corpses of seven children allegedly killed in the strike, five of them crumpled in the back of a van and two lying on the ground.
